Serial Number Format Typically, the serial number consists of a product code and a product group code, usually separated by a hyphen. The serial number is usually a 12- or 13-digit number. Serial numbers are not required to be unique, although a product installed on a system will most likely have a unique serial number. However, each component or device installed on a computer may generate its own unique serial number. Product Groups Product groups, or product groups, can be used in AutoCAD as a way to group items with similar properties. This allows the user to more easily see what is available in a particular group, as well as to search and sort items according to their properties. Although it is possible to sort items by specifying one or more property values, this can be a cumbersome task. Product groups are usually based on product groups. To create a product group, open the Customize User Interface menu, and select Product Groups from the Grouping tab. Serial numbers for older software may be entered as above, followed by the three-letter qualifier (000). For example, 5184-000-1234567 might be used to represent the serial number of some earlier version of AutoCAD. Some organizations have adopted a more descriptive convention, like "AutoCAD-2010-Serial-Number-100". The qualifiers are issued by vendors and do not have to be used for that application. The following table shows the sequence for building a serial number: Serial number length varies per product group Ordinarily, the length of a serial number is related to the length of the product's product group. Product Code A product code is used to uniquely identify a product, and this product code may be used to determine or sort on a property, such as updating. Product Group A product group is a listing that includes a property name, a description, and a list of the item's properties. The following example shows a product group. When you are customizing AutoCAD, you will add the "product group" as one of the property values. When you are grouping items, the product group is displayed as the product group filter. Insert
