Subacromial bursitis is a common finding in patients with shoulder pain after a recent trauma or shoulder dislocation. An important differential diagnosis of this painful condition is the more rare anterolateral rotatory instability (ALRI) of the humeral head. Patients with ALRI may undergo surgery to restore congruence and articular cartilage between the humeral head and the glenoid. In this study, we were interested in the size of the subacromial bursa in patients with ALRI. We hypothesized that the size of the subacromial bursa would be significantly smaller in patients with ALRI compared with a control population. We analyzed a consecutive series of 150 shoulder MRI examinations of patients with ALRI (group 1) and 150 patients with traumatic bursitis (group 2) in which the subacromial bursa was the most important finding. Two neuroradiologists independently determined the size of the subacromial bursa. For subsequent analysis, all specimens were measured by a third reviewer. The size of the subacromial bursa was significantly smaller in patients with ALRI than in patients with burs 09e8f5149f
