An intravenous (IV) port delivers medication or fluids directly into the bloodstream via a vein. Different types of IV ports include a peripheral venous catheter, peripherally inserted central catheter, or central venous catheter. A peripheral venous catheter is a device that is used to deliver fluids into the bloodstream via a vein in the hand, arm, or leg. A peripherally inserted central catheter is a device that is inserted into a vein at a site near the heart. This device delivers fluids directly into the heart or the large vessels surrounding the heart. A central venous catheter is a device that is inserted into the vein in the neck (subclavian, jugular, or femoral). A peripheral intravenous catheter is a device used to deliver fluid into a vein in the hand or arm. Intravenous catheter ports will typically require a needle to place into the vein. Intravenous port uses a small needle with a blunt end to deliver fluids into the vein. Class Notes are available by subscription.
