I know it doesn't have a callback function, but what is the best way to get the timer to work for something similar to something like this: var version_hint = "Hello World!"; // I want this string to be echoed X number of times using jQuery Timer. // This is just a simple way to demonstrate the problem I have. I don't want to // use an external file that is loaded using ajax. $('#test').time('#version_hint', 2000); Just to be clear, the #version_hint string is loaded multiple times and I want to know when the #test string has been loaded X number of times. What is the best way to do this? A: I would recommend having your own version of jQuery. When you call jQuery(document).ready(), it will call jQuery.text(). This is an explicit call to get the "Hello World" text. Then you could have a function that repeats it, and attach a timer to the interval like this: function keepAfter(loadCount) { $.text(loadCount, loadCount, false) $.timer(1000, function() { keepAfter(loadCount + 1); }, 1000) } keepAfter(0); Keep in mind that jQuery will find the element #test, and not have to find it explicitly. It's also a good idea to learn the.load() function. You could use that to load in your own data, and just show the loading animation on
