It involves a lot of complicated math and calculations that are used to produce images that are as realistic as possible. At the heart of most game engines is a C++ class that handles these tasks for you: the Renderer class. The requirements for a good renderer are certainly high: the visual output is usually displayed on a high-resolution screen, using a pretty shader that can work with shaders to create other types of effects and even other screens (e.g. lighting effects). Even though the Renderer class is the one handling all the math and processing for the Renderer, it handles it using a set of different methods that can be used to produce all sorts of effects, textures, lighting, shaders, particles, etc. Each method is able to produce the output as pixels on the screen or a file, just as we shall see now. The methods available are: * begin() - This method can be used to add the output to the screen as we did it previously. * render() - This method handles the rendering of the textures that are added to the screen. * glEnd() - This method is used to clean up all the objects that have been added to the screen. * renderViewport() - This method is used to render the output to a specific area of the screen. * renderFullscreen() - This method is used to render the output to the entire display screen, instead of a specific area. * Render2dToFile() - This method
