Plasma levels of thiopurines and 6-methylmercaptopurine ribonucleotides in IgA-type acute lymphoblastic leukaemia: relationship to clinical and therapeutic variables. Although thiopurine immunosuppressants are the cornerstone of the treatment of acute lymphoblastic leukaemia (ALL), the molecular basis of thiopurine toxicity remains poorly understood. We have sought to further our understanding of thiopurine toxicity in ALL by investigating the association of plasma levels of inosine 5'-monophosphate (IMP) and 6-methylmercaptopurine ribonucleotide (MMPR), pharmacologically active metabolites of the thiopurine prodrug 6-mercaptopurine, with clinical variables and thiopurine metabolism. Plasma levels of 6-methylthioguanine nucleotides (6MGR) and other thiopurine metabolites were measured in 42 patients with ALL treated with oral 6-mercaptopurine (methotrexate-like) therapy. Both direct (IMP) and indirect (6MGR) measurements of active metabolite levels were used. Plasma levels of thiopurine metabolites were positively associated with age, white cell count, treatment duration and use of corticosteroids, and were inversely associated with the duration of active treatment and use of methotrexate. Both 6MGR and IMP metabolite levels were independently associated with the duration of active treatment, after adjustment for age, white cell count and use of corticosteroids. Other significant associations were limited to lower levels of 6MGR metabolite and thiopurine treatment duration or corticosteroids. These results suggest a possible relationship between the plasma levels of 6MGR metabolites and thiopurine toxicity and indicate a need for further studies of thiopurine metabolism in ALL.

[Clinical and genetic studies in children with autism]. Autism is a developmental disorder, characterized by deficits in social interaction, communication, and imagination. Clinical phenotypes of autism vary among patients, but are often accompanied by epilepsy, gastrointestinal dysfunction, and musculoskeletal disorders. Since the 1990s, the inheritance of autism has been assumed to be polygenic. In recent years, more than 100 genes have been reported to be associated with autism, and functional studies have also suggested biological mechanisms. The present article focuses on clinical characteristics and etiological factors, with a focus on genes associated with autism.

Q: Getting values from two form fields I have two fields: How do I get both values into a string (or some other data) and create an alert with a prompt? A: `document.pam.value` will retrieve the value of the first element with the name of "pam", and `document.pass.value` will return the value of the second. So how do you create an alert? Are you asking how to create a javascript prompt?

document.getElementById("promptHere").innerHTML = "Are you a..." + document.getElementById("pam").value + " or " +

document.getElementById("pass").value; Note: You will want to add on more verification on the server side to make sure that the values are exactly what you expect. A: You can use getElementsByName() to get all input elements with the same name. See #
