VR Game devlog style for beginners: In this video I will be going over all the process for creating the game. From the first idea to the last bug fixes. I hope this will help all the new VR game developers trying to enter the VR Game space. Feel free to leave any comment or suggestion below! As for how I fixed the issues, besides spending days trying to make the game work properly, I wrote a small, strict and dumb script that goes through the entire build of the game and detects each type of issue. This is used to identify the errors and make them easy to find. The thing I'm glad about is that all these fixes were found without even looking at the game code, but only by clicking on each warning. Here I had some limitations that I faced: The most important one is that I couldn't fix all the issues in one day, so I tried to do it one by one in short period of time and I had to go back to find the first issue every time. Second, everytime I tried to fix one issue, another one would pop up. This wasn't a big problem, but it took a lot of time doing those fixes. However, this method works really well. The game has been updated a lot, so to all the people who tried to download the game and the "beast" is your fault. We're trying to announce some events this weekend, but some of the issues from last week will be behind us on Sunday. The first event is the #Gamerate Lausanne, of course. In addition to this, we have another class on Friday, where we will talk about the basics of Unity, to make the community able to put a game together in under an hour (And finally, some friends of the festival will be at the booth on Saturday, so it's a good opportunity to meet them. We're also going to start to announce some of the VR

"Only vaguely related to the PC version - very well done" - PCGAMER Game "Plants vs. Zombies" lot of fun and most people, the general population, seem to enjoy it. So, that was one story of fun.

And...now for some bad news. One of my friends committed suicide and I found myself in tears. It didn't seem to make any sense, but I was thinking to myself, "This should have been me, instead of him. Nobody is to blame. It just happens, but it shouldn't be me." I tried to come to terms with the fact that, in all reality, it wasn't my fault. It isn't anybody's fault. We don't decide our fate. Suicide is a natural human experience. I almost wonder how I'd react if I were brain-dead, conscious but unable to move or respond...and then found out that the person providing my breath and life was also suffering the same fate. I would probably start crying because I would realize that I would be responsible for their deaths. I don't know if anybody ever gets over that kind of horror in their mind, I haven't, not really. I still feel sad about it. I didn't expect to be affected this way. But then I turned it over to God. I looked at it like this; I could have prevented the suicide, but I didn't. So why should I suffer guilt? I may have helped my friend by being there and giving him attention and not letting him suffer alone, but am I responsible for anything that happens to that person after that? I don't see how I can be. I don't know if God thinks the same way. I have to believe that he does. I don't even know if this post has any value or is worthwhile. As I sit here with a bottle of wine, having a lovely dinner of leftover pizza, I see my friend's suicide as just another sorrow that has come into my life. It is not really that important

“The dark night of the soul is sweeter than all the feasts of the world.” — Henry Miller “Obscene imagery is worth expending a lot of energy going after. If you wouldn't do the dirty deed and find a picture of sex or murder interesting, you probably won't get much joy trying to obliterate the obscene from the image.” — Graham Lee Allen “Skeletal West” — Tetsuji Hayashi “The Walking Mushroom”: Silence echoes in the depths of these abstracted woods. Built on Unity3D, Bipolar is not your typical indie game. The art style and the gameplay itself are quite unique. With 50 levels of Bipolar, you will never know what to expect. Each level is its own unique challenge and quite frankly all 50 will keep you in the game for hours. The game features 50 levels, each with several unique challenges. Some levels are based on gravity, others on friction, others on many other concepts, all of which you will have to master to reach the end. How to Play: Bipolar is a game with a simple premise. Learn more about our game here: About: Brain as One (BaO) is a multidisciplinary arts collective based on the Caulfield campus of Monash University in Melbourne, Australia. Our academic interests are in computing, computer games, the arts, sculpture, animation and neurophysiological projects. Brain as One began in 2009 as an arts practice, and has since expanded into game development. We have found that our perspectives are intrinsically linked to the opportunities offered by contemporary media arts practice. Since 2010, we have been working on a game called Bipolar. Bipolar is a game with a simple premise. Get your player object to the end green portal using the magnetic polarities of positive and negative to assist you in reaching that goal. Unlike most games, there is no traditional jumping. The power of magnets is your best friend here. That's it. See you at the green portal. Level progression in Bipolar is simple. The only real requirement to progressing through the game is that your object eventually reaches the end portal. However, the portal may be moved, so it can be tricky to get to. The game has two modes, play and level creation. Play mode simply allows you to play a game of Bipolar. However, creating your own levels gives you complete control over the game. This allows you to create levels which are unique and challenging in and of themselves. Some of the more obvious ones include mine shafts where you must move (and bounce off of) falling blocks of metal and similar hazards; levitating platforms where you must move along the floating surface itself; and space-themed levels where you might be tossed to and fro in outer space. Furthermore, levels can have their own themes. The Interspecies theme for example is based on the conflicts between individuals of various species and the competitions they
