This past April the public got a chance to view the nearly completed plan for the first time on the UEA's campus. The final construction budget for the project is $500,000 and will be paid for with public resources. The project is not only working with the City of Vancouver and local public officials to determine how construction will impact the extensive ecosystem of the Lougheed Park area and the existing paths and trails which lead to the site. In the spring they will also be moving into the next phase of its environmental review. This will consist of "the wildlife habitat and nature corridor component where the connector trails will be specifically planned to be designed for the purpose of increasing wildlife habitat and connectivity within the park." Effect of cyclooxygenase and cyclooxygenase-2 inhibitors on growth of human choroidal melanoma cells in culture. To determine if there is a difference in the effect of the cyclooxygenase (COX) inhibitor, indomethacin, and the selective COX-2 inhibitor, rofecoxib, on tumor cell growth. Choroidal melanoma cell lines were established, including C918 and OCM-2 cells. Cell viability was assessed by MTS assay. Cell proliferation was assessed by the thymidine uptake assay. C918 and OCM-2 cells were incubated with indomethacin and rofecoxib (10-100 microM) alone or with melanocyte-stimulating hormone (100 ng/ml) and examined for cell viability, thymidine uptake, and migration. COX-2 expression was evaluated by Western blot and immunocytochemistry. Indomethacin decreased the growth of C918 and OCM-2 cells at 100 and 10 microM, respectively, but not the growth of the nontumor cell line NCC-5. In the presence of melanocyte-stimulating hormone (100 ng/ml), the growth of C918 and OCM-2 cells was enhanced but was reduced with indomethacin (10 and 10 microM). Rofecoxib also reduced the growth of C918 and OCM-2 cells (10 microM) but was ineffective at lower concentrations. The induction of COX-2 was associated with an increased expression of cyclin D1. Indomethacin and rofecoxib inhibited the growth of choroidal melanoma cells at concentrations that inhibit COX-2. Indomethacin and rofecoxib interfere with the proliferative effects of melanocyte-stimulating hormone at concentrations that inhibit COX-2 and the expression of cyclin D1.
