The architecture of nuclear chromatin has been the subject of a considerable amount of attention in recent years. The general concept is that chromatin is built up of repeating nucleosomes, which are bound together by linker histones, DNA-binding proteins and higher-order structures that maintain the chromatin architecture. This arrangement is thought to be maintained and dictated by three major forces acting on chromatin: the DNA helical supercoil, the linker histone and histone H1 interactions with the DNA, and forces between the DNA and the nucleosome. In recent years it has become clear that the structural organization of chromatin is influenced by factors such as transcription, replication, and cell cycle position.
