Evaluation of modified Fite's double smear method for rapid detection of Mycobacterium tuberculosis from sputum samples. One hundred and four patients suspected of tuberculosis, who were examined for acid-fast bacilli (AFB) microscopy in Mycobacterium tuberculosis bacteriology laboratory of National Tuberculosis Center were included in the study. Ziehl-Neelsen, modified Fite's stain and immunofluorescence were performed for each sputum sample. There was a significant rise in AFB positivity from 55% in Ziehl-Neelsen stain to 71.8% in modified Fite's stain and to 93.6% in immunofluorescence test. Based on the preliminary data, modified Fite's stain is suggested as a simple, rapid, cost-effective and effective diagnostic method for the detection of Mycobacterium tuberculosis from sputum in the laboratory.

The first thing to keep in mind is that the Equifax problem is not really about credit-scoring algorithms or people's low credit scores. It is about people's credit reports, an increasingly important part of life for many. To illustrate this, think about this: An American might have a lot of credit information about him in Equifax's database, but he might never have even seen that information except in his credit report. The average US adult uses his or her credit report at least three times a year. For most people, credit cards, auto loans, and credit cards aren't among the most important decisions they make. Most people who have an account aren't aware of the details of their credit card's terms, even though it is the single biggest credit product on the market. Major retailers will readily tell
