In solid-state image sensing devices of the frame interline transfer (FLIT) type, a plurality of photoelectric transducers or photosensors are arrayed on the surface of a semiconductor substrate in a matrix array. The photosensor array is made of a semiconductor material such as silicon (Si). The photosensors are arranged and operated in a two-dimensional array form. The solid-state image sensing device of the frame interline transfer type contains a horizontal synchronization signal for controlling the timing for reading the signal charges accumulated in photosensors. A known solid-state image sensing device of this kind has a plurality of photosensors arranged in a two-dimensional array, a horizontal scanning circuit, and a vertical scanning circuit. In response to a signal of the horizontal synchronization signal, the horizontal scanning circuit sequentially selects and drives photosensors, while the vertical scanning circuit sequentially selects and drives a column of photosensors. Accordingly, photoelectric transducers or photosensors are also selected, and image signals are transferred to associated horizontal signal line. Image signals stored in the horizontal signal lines are sequentially read by a scanner circuit. The image signals stored in the horizontal signal lines are sequentially read by a scanner circuit. In general, the photosensor has a PN junction, and the junction capacitance thereof amounts to several picofarads. Therefore, the photosensor may not be saturated for signals having a relatively small amount of charge, and a signal which is stored in the photosensor is susceptible to a noise. In addition, the photosensor has a problem in the linearity of the light response characteristic. The vertical transfer register or the horizontal
