What's new in The Unbreakable Chain:

a Note of FAITH Had Sir John Falstaff, the great drinking companion of Sir Lewis Pageant, been any different in his behaviors, he may have been more fully endowed of "merriment, feat, valor, health" in The Canterbury Tales's Prologue. Where does one go, however, when the humor has turned to a static approach to a disconnected word game? To Saint Paul? If so, then the solid stylistic choices to help us cope with the ex-Falstaff and troubled Cornwall are our productions of Richard Brome's "Loves Labor's Lost" and "The Surprising Life and Death of Cardinal Richelieu." John Stone, the artistic director at Claremont Collegiate, posed the challenge to the students: "Stand alone and we will, as our task, make rich and complicated Shakespeare and think how he would be made, you know, work in that for you, as an audience, five and one half years later." For the modern reader, Richard Brome's comedies — The Surprising Life and Death of Cardinal Richelieu, The Silent Woman (one who is assumed to be dead in a play ending she has not yet premiered) and Loves Labor's Lost — are all three part of the Crown Theatre Omnibus of Shakesperian Plays 2008-2009. These plays are full of rich reading. Stone explains that Brome's work shows a dislike for kings and their pretentions. "One of the things, for instance," he says, "is that for all the play by play structure it has, it's a little bit of an anti-theatre. There are so many jokes about clowns, there are so many jokes about the French, there are so many jokes about popes, and the way all of them exist in the plays, yet the point of them, I like to think, is they get rid of their dominion. They get rid of their kingdom. They get rid of the state." Yet this cottage-industry approach makes the material clunky and hard to navigate. "I always tell the kids," he says, "it's just like jazz; nothing in them is real. They take bits and pieces and use it like a song or like anything else. It becomes its own creature."
