Breast cancer is a heterogeneous disease, and a large proportion of patients do not respond to therapy. For this reason, there is a strong need to identify biomarkers that can be used for early diagnosis and for more precise classification of breast tumors. Leptin is expressed by both breast cancer cells and stromal cells. The current study was conducted to evaluate the role of stromal leptin in breast cancer. First, we correlated stromal leptin expression with clinicopathological parameters and found that it was associated with larger tumors, higher histological grade, HER2 expression, lymph node involvement, and distant metastasis. Furthermore, leptinaemia was significantly higher in women with breast cancer than in healthy controls d0c515b9f4
