We are currently using an inbound SMS service that attaches a custom header and a querystring to the sms. We are sending messages from the mobile web to a server with PHP. Do we get to receive a similar header and payload in an outbound message? Can I simply attach a querystring in the same way as the inbound service does? A: You can send either an HTML or a plain text message. So, yes, you would be able to add your own custom header and put whatever payload you like in it. You may find it easier to use the Text Message API instead. Friday, March 26, 2009 I've reached some sort of breaking point with the Michael Jackson... and suddenly, I can't even tell you why. I hate the guy (and yes, I am one of those few haters, unlike the numbers of haterade fans who are fascinated by his story and his music), and I hate the assumptions I see in the media about him (and yes, this includes you, CNN),
