Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an agricultural combine and, in particular, to an improved headbox assembly for use on such a combine. 2. Description of the Related Art Agricultural combines in which grain is threshed and cleaned from crop materials have a headbox for separating a mixture of the grain and crop materials into a clean grain stream, and a dirty crop materials stream. The headbox generally comprises a mixing chamber, in which the grain and crop materials are mixed, and a duct that directs the mixture of the grain and crop materials towards a discharge opening. Headbox assemblies having elongate mixing chambers are known. The aim of such an elongate mixing chamber is to mix the crop materials with the grain in a homogeneous manner while keeping the length and cross-sectional area of the mixing chamber as small as possible. To this end, the elongate mixing chamber generally includes a concave feed opening at its front end into which the crop materials are introduced, and a discharge opening at its back end. At the discharge opening, the crop materials and the grain are discharged to form the clean grain stream and the dirty crop materials stream. A problem with a conventional mixing chamber is that the grain may be separated from the crop materials by the grain distribution means that creates a boundary layer of grain at the front of the mixing chamber, which is discharged in the clean grain stream and separated from the dirty crop materials stream. It is desirable to improve the distribution of the grain and crop materials within the mixing chamber to increase the proportion of grain that is separated into the clean grain stream.
