The present invention is also directed to the discovery of nanocrystals prepared by the present process and to the use of these nanocrystals for imaging or other purposes such as sensors. In recent years, much attention has been directed to the development of luminescent nanocrystals and particularly to the use of such nanocrystals in the preparation of opto-electronic devices. A promising prospect for such devices is in the area of solid state sensors, which are easy to fabricate, inexpensive and may prove resistant to degradation in harsh environments. Illumination of nanocrystals made from the II-VI semiconductors doped with rare earth metals leads to an emission which is especially sharp and more intense than the emission of the same nanocrystals upon illumination with radiation having longer wavelengths. Luminescence of nanocrystals is said to include the phenomenon whereby a species absorbs light and is excited to a higher electronic state thereby generating another species of lower energy state. The species thus excited to a lower energy state is said to be in the excited state. In contrast to the II-VI nanocrystals, there are only a few reports of similar phenomena in III-V nanocrystals. This may be because of problems with reproducing the phenomena in the III-V system. First, and most important, the III-V nanocrystals are generally small. Because of their small size, the nanocrystals are known to aggregate rapidly. A second important consideration which limits the development of the III-V nanocrystals is the lack of chemical methods to bind molecules to the surface of the nanocrystals. The present invention is based on the use of I-III-V nanocrystals to enhance the luminescence intensity and detect low concentrations of materials. This and other uses of I-III-V nanocrystals will be apparent from the following discussion. Previously, scientists have used the II-VI semiconductors, particularly CdS nanocrystals, in opto-electronic devices because the larger size of these nanocrystals increases the probability of neighboring nanocrystals becoming electronically coupled. The coupling is believed to were then Tossed Away by Howard; and the third one, Mr. Ratburn, a former child sidekick of Plucky, his younger brother, was also Tossed Away by Howard, in the storyline "The Mail Strikes Again". One of the most famous of the series was The Tale of Scrooge McDuck, a four-part serial in which Scrooge McDuck is sent to the magical City of Gold as a punishment for becoming a tycoon. His main goal is to become rich and famous. After working hard, Scrooge encounters an odd billionaire named Donald Duck, a stereotypical blue-collar worker with a terrible singing voice.

During the course of the series, Scrooge meets other oddball characters and becomes reacquainted with his friends from the past. The series won the 1975 Edgar Award for Best Television Story. Animation historians consider this series as the first fully animated television series to be devoted to an anthology format.

The other animated series followed this format, until Disney launched the Disney's Adventures of the Gummi Bears series. The Gummi Bears originated in Norway, but later launched a long-running television show in the United States. Disney Studios also produced several animation feature films in 1975. The four movies were loosely based upon the original four segments of The Gummi Bears TV series. In 2015, Disney released a series called Mighty Ducks, which is also about a group of misfits in a traditional sports school, who become heroes after only one day at practice. The show aired as a part of Disney Junior's Jump Street! series and gained a great success. As of 2018, a sequel to the original series called Mighty Ducks 2 was announced to air on the Disney+ streaming service. In 2016, Disney Studios released a sequel to The Magic Jungle, called The New Adventures of Winnie the Pooh. In it, the Hundred Acre Wood is invaded by mythical animals. The show ran for two seasons and finished airing in 2017. A third season of this show was announced, and premiered in 2019. Starting in 2019, Disney Studios has been releasing several series on Disney's streaming service. Titles include a reboot of the popular DuckTales series, a reboot of
