Hap_4.5_Dealer.pdf (32.1 Mb).Coevolutionary and phylogenetic analyses of a multigene data set reveal the clonal origin of Japanese and European Fusarium oxysporum isolates. Fusarium oxysporum is a filamentous soil-borne plant pathogen causing wilt diseases in over 200 plant species worldwide. Two isolates of F. oxysporum f. sp. radicis-lycopersici (F. radicis-lycopersici) var. nymphaeae were obtained from symptomatic radish, Raphanus sativus, seeds (collected from Japan and Italy, respectively). These two isolates were genetically identical on the basis of their internal transcribed spacer sequence and repetitive-sequence-based polymerase chain reaction markers. However, differences were found in molecular analyses of genes encoding 14 ribosomal proteins. To further investigate whether these two isolates are derived from a single genetic event or not, the polymorphisms present in the studied ribosomal protein genes of F. radicis-lycopersici and other F. oxysporum species were examined. The data showed that one Japanese and an Italian F. radicis-lycopersici var. nymphaeae isolate were genetically identical. These results indicate that Japanese and Italian F. radicis-lycopersici isolates are descendants of a single event in which two different F. oxysporum isolates were combined.To reduce the size of a display device and the weight and power consumption of a mobile device using a display device, a metal having a low density is generally used as a source electrode of the display device. Accordingly, color shift occurs when different materials are sequentially used as an electrode material, and display quality is degraded. For example, in a polycrystalline silicon (polysilicon) TFT-LCD, a transparent conductive material such as indium-tin oxide (ITO), indium-zinc oxide (IZO), or a metal which has a sufficiently low resistance such as aluminum (Al) or silver (Ag) is generally used. However, the metal has a high reflectance and thus image quality is degraded. In addition, since a screen is damaged by a high voltage, a
