At a time when Seamless, DoorDash, Instacart and the rest of the customer-delivery behemoths are pressing California to require their drivers to be paid $15 per hour plus benefits, a surge in gig economy startups is carving out a niche in food delivery and groceries. At Foodler, the startup co-founded by Silicon Valley veteran Sanjay Dasti, the company recently passed the $1 million mark in annual sales. Its offering is lunch delivery via a Web site and app, similar to mobile-ordering apps such as HelloFresh and DoorDash. Why it matters: The food industry is launching a long overdue crackdown on gig work and is starting to squeeze out new companies. It's not just about the pay, which is often less than $15 per hour, but about the rules that work imposes on how a gig company can be organized. The gig economy poses new challenges in public health and public safety. Nearly two years ago, Foodler went on a hiring binge, and since then it has gone from 200 to a staff of 580. Most of its workers are women — 60% of the 300-strong office is female — and are from 18 to 30 years old. They work from home, day and night. And they are clustered in the Bay Area and Los Angeles. At Foodler's headquarters in San Francisco, the menu of desks is expanding, and there are more cubicles than at Apple. The company says the majority of its workers are home

Cry for help, citizens: With regard to the British Museum's new exhibit of Egyptian religious art, the Pyramids Are Still on Thin Ice (7 May), Mo Farah said you'll be pardoned for owning an Egyptian sarcophagus, but for him to be hounding one's owners for a fee is "just not on". I haven't come across a similar banning of the supposed crime of owning an Egyptian sarcophagus, with conviction for theft or robbery or even the more mundane charge of possession of a police camera. So far, there has been no further appearance by the Egyptian authorities. But the action of the Egyptian authorities as a pressure group demands further comment. Farah continued: "I wouldn't be surprised if the people in the museum were hounded by the authorities to withdraw the exhibition because it's inconvenient to have such a controversial thing in the museum. I'm a lot more exercised by the fact that this is in a museum and I'm not saying museums shouldn't be free to have exhibits they think are worthwhile. They're talking about the Muslim world and if there's a sensitivity about the state of the Muslim world I fully support that and I have no objection to them doing it, but you wouldn't see these things in the British Museum, there'd be a furore in the world about it." It is not clear whether Farah is alone in his feeling that the "furore" would emerge, or whether he just has the ear of the director of the London museum, Dr Vivien Pollock, a close associate of David Cameron and Nick Clegg. Certainly, the museum's team had already received many hundreds of phone calls and emails in response to the exhibition. I could not find anything in the museum's exhibition catalogue to suggest why not. Other than the fact that the museum makes its money from people and organisations, not just governments, by letting them sell individual objects and find their way to countries where they will make money. It seems an odd idea that the museum wouldn't want these objects in its collections. That said, it should be admitted that the museum doesn't want a museum-size item like this being moved around the country for display; it's fixed in its palace at St Petersburg. But why not? Why can't a British museum hold an 6d1f23a050
