One-year follow-up study]. The bone mineral density (BMD) of the femur head and lumbar spine was studied in 124 postmenopausal women, aged from 43 to 58 years, in order to examine its relationship with serum calcium, phosphorus, parathyroid hormone, and 25-hydroxyvitamin D3 (25-OHD3). BMD at the femur head declined with increasing age, but the decline was not significant in cases aged from 43 to 49 years. The BMD of the lumbar spine decreased significantly with increasing age and the regression line of the percentage changes in the BMD of the spine and femur head was almost parallel. The percentage changes in the BMD of the femur head and spine correlated well with those of calcium and phosphorus. The percentage change in the BMD of the femur head was significantly correlated with that of the BMD of the spine, but not significantly correlated with that of the 25-OHD3. The percentage change in the BMD of the lumbar spine showed significant correlation with that of the BMD of the femur head, but not with that of the BMD of the femur neck. These results suggested that the regression line of percentage changes in the BMD of the femur head is parallel to that of calcium and phosphorus, and this close relationship may explain the regression line of percentage changes in the BMD of the lumbar spine. 6d1f23a050
