To investigate the association between mortality and total and dietary vitamin D (VD) and calcium (Ca) intake. Prospective cohort study. Population-based study among adults aged 60 and over in Mexico City. 700 subjects who were part of the Mexican Health and Aging Study. Deaths were recorded during a 5-year follow-up. Ca intake and VD intake were estimated by using a food frequency questionnaire. The association between nutrients and overall mortality and mortality due to cancer, circulatory system, respiratory system, and other causes was analyzed by Cox regression models. Multivariate Cox regression models were used. We found an association between cancer mortality and low Ca intake in women ( $P$  for trend = 0.006). Also, low Ca intake showed an association with respiratory mortality in men ( $P$  for trend = 0.029). With respect to VD intake, our analysis showed a positive association with overall and circulatory mortality in men ( $P$  for trend = 0.044; 0.040, respectively). However, in women, only overall mortality showed a positive association with VD intake ( $P$  for trend = 0.007). The results of this study suggest that the marginal intake of Ca is associated with a higher risk of cancer mortality, while a high intake of Ca seems to be associated with a higher risk of circulatory mortality. A positive association was observed between mortality and VD intake. More studies on VD and Ca intake and mortality are needed to have a better understanding of the association between these nutrients and mortality.
