The present invention relates to a device for positioning an endoscope to aid in the diagnosis of an aneurysm in a part of the body. According to a prior art method of measuring the diameter of a blood vessel, a blood vessel is temporarily isolated from surrounding tissue by applying a clamp to the distal end of a first instrument and the proximal end of a second instrument is inserted into the body; the proximal end of the second instrument is opened to expose the proximal portion of the blood vessel. A sensor is attached to the distal end of the second instrument and is moved within the blood vessel by inserting the distal end of the second instrument. The position of the sensor is displayed on a visual display unit. The diameters of two blood vessels which are distal to the blood vessel in which the sensor is being measured, are measured by measuring the lengths from the sensor to the distal ends of two other instruments. The diameters of the two blood vessels are then determined as the average of the two blood vessel diameters measured. See U.S. Pat. No. 4,931,061. If the position of the distal end of the sensor is accurately displayed, the accuracy of the measurement of the length of the blood vessel will be increased. However, there is a problem with the prior art device that the position of the distal end of the sensor is not accurately displayed. A failure to accurately display the position of the distal end of the sensor, is attributed to poor stability of the second instrument.

The Nobel Prizes will be awarded in a ceremony in Stockholm Monday. The prizes were divided last year for breakthroughs in chemistry, physics and medicine.

Brenner, 61, from Cambridge University, was one of the first to use molecular genetics to study living things. In the 1970s, he discovered that DNA was the molecule that controlled protein synthesis. Chalfie, of the California
