As you can see in the example, the JAVA_HOME variable is missing. It is present in the system but is not recognized by the JAVA command because it is a non-ASCII character (a Hebrew letter) that Java thinks is a typo. To correct this, you must set the JAVA_HOME variable to the correct directory, for example to C:\Programs\Java\jre1.8.0_151. After doing that, you can run the command that is more complete and without the problem: java -version. We Have Just Backed Internet to Once Again Everybody loves the Internet. I am, of course, referring to dial up subscribers. The Internet became available via ADSL (asymmetric digital subscriber line) a couple of years ago, and while most folks are really satisfied with the speed at which they are getting the Internet access, they have to pay for the service every month. While there is no doubt that this service is inexpensive for most people, it is actually usually far more expensive than the traditional service that they are using now. Thankfully, as technology marches on, they have found an alternative. Many providers have started offering Internet access via Wi-Fi, which is a wireless technology that allows users to hook up to an Internet connection through a wireless hotspot. Theoretically, this allows people to have Internet access no matter where they go within their own home. In addition to the fact that it is extremely portable and allows them to stay plugged into the Internet 24/7, it also allows them to take their Internet with them. This means that people can have this access via the Internet in the office, in their own living room and even in their own bedroom. I thought that this might be an interesting alternative, so I decided to see what a service that offers free wireless Internet access was like. It is called Free-Wireless, and it is a service offered through Time Warner. When I initially tried it out, I was extremely satisfied with the service, as I got speeds that were close to my current connection. I also have to tell you that it was extremely easy to use. You just need to log on to the time warner website from your computer and get to the wireless section. There, you will be able to select a hotspot, enter a password and you will be ready to go. Now, while I am incredibly satisfied with this service, I decided to look up
