Sometimes when a program or application program of a computer system is executed, faults, such as an illegal instruction, occur to degrade the operation of the computer system. Some faults degrade the operation of the computer system to such a degree that the computer system crashes, that is, the program or application program is not executed any more. Such computer system crashes should be analyzed and solved as soon as possible. Otherwise, the computer system is not able to process data any more. As a technique for analyzing and solving computer system crashes, techniques that analyze an execution trace generated by an operation trace information recording apparatus have been known. Such techniques apply a self-checking algorithm to the execution trace information in a predetermined order to check the execution trace information of the computer system. In this case, a CPU that executes the program or application program repeatedly applies an execution pattern to the execution trace information and checks it for a fault. In the case where the execution trace information is erroneous, an error address is detected. The above technique is disclosed in, for example, Unexamined Japanese Patent Publication No. 8-230927. In Unexamined Japanese Patent Publication No. 8-230927, an execution trace information recording apparatus identifies an error address in a computer system on the basis of an address not recorded in the execution trace information. However, the error address often does not exist in the execution trace information, and accordingly, it may be impossible to analyze the computer system crash. For this reason, a technique is proposed in U c6a93da74d
