I have an API which exposes the data from my app. Let say I have in my API a resource called "User". Now the first question is : Do I need the User resource in my app or is it better to replace it with a simple Id? Because if I have 2 developer (A,B) then user #2 (B) will access the user resource all the time via the API, but me (A) will not need to because I have a simple id in my app that is automatically generated. Is it possible to achieve this with Rest apis? I am not really experienced with apis so any help would be appreciated. A: IMO you don't need the User resource in the application layer. You can use the simple id (entity ID) in your application layer if you want. If the user has a meaningful object in the Application layer such as a UserProfile entity you can access it via a repository. This comes in handy if you want to add user data based on it's user profile information. Also if you want to access the user's data in the API, the entity User is the best choice. This is because when you use this object in the API it is mapped to the users database id (which is the entity ID of the User object). Let say you want to access the user's age, name or some other field. You can pull that information from the user's entity id. User user = repository.findById(userId); String age = user.getAge(); String name = user.getName(); In the above example the user is the entity User and it is mapped to the database id of the user. Hope this helps. Third Generation Computer Systems (3GCS) are rapidly becoming the standard for mobile data network systems.
