The installer doesn't offer too many choices in regards to where to save the VM. I'd recommend just saving it to the desktop. Otherwise you'll have to change the directory each time you install a new VM if that is the location you want. I haven't had too many issues with Windows 10 and Hyper-V but I know people who have run into issues with Windows 8.1 and Hyper-V so you'll have to play around with this depending on what you are using and what the issues are. Then you'll need to download the VHDX.ISO and burn it to a CD/DVD. Once it is installed you'll want to backup all your data from your existing VMs onto that VM. But first create a clone of the VM you want to run in Hyper-V. Don't worry if you can't get it to install right away. It's kinda hard to tell what is going on if you are getting a black screen or something is not installing right. Before I begin I have to say to download the ISO file from the Microsoft website. Normally the download link will be accessible from the title of this article or in the above section. If you are experiencing problems downloading the files from here simply copy and paste the download URL into your browser. But if you have trouble do the following:- Open your Web browser. - Enter <http://go.microsoft.com/fwlink/?LinkId=310604> in the address field, or replace 'go.microsoft.com' with your favorite Web browser's homepage. After the download completes you should now have a folder on your desktop labeled with the name of the file you downloaded. Open the folder and you should see a VHDX file. This file is created by the ISO image.

Hyper-V still requires at least Windows Server 2012 or Windows Server 2012 R2. It does NOT require a domain controller. I originally used Windows Server 2012 R2 but came across many tutorials that recommended Windows Server 2008 R2 as the minimum. Some suggested it as a requirement that prevented Windows Server 2012 R2 users from creating the virtual machine. This is not true and can be found simply by searching for the error message. My error message was: “Windows Server 2008 R2 Hyper-V The minimum edition of Windows Server 2012 R2 is currently required. An X86 based virtualization platform is required for Hyper-V.” The easiest way around this is simply to use Windows Server 2012 which is less expensive and doesn't require more hardware than 2008 R2. Note that your hardware has to be 64-bit as well as the guest operating system. For this reason, I initially tried Windows Server 2008 R2 which has the 64-bit processor capable hardware. There are some variations in options between Windows Server 2012 and Windows Server 2012 R2. Normally the Windows installer will pick the default option based on the edition that is installed on your machine. I have a Xeon 64-bit with E5620, and I installed Server 2012 R2 so this is what I selected. To be eligible for Windows Server 2012 you need to have a 'Virtual Processor' built into your motherboard. For early Windows Server 2008, there was no Virtual Processor, but with Server 2012 that changed and it is now required. Older servers do NOT have a VPU, but it can be added later. There were no VPUs installed in the test hardware but I have added them later in this post.
