"people have a right to know and to ask questions." teachers, who make up about half the workforce in the state, are also concerned about the prospect of a cut in their pension benefits. "we are definitely worried about the cuts. i don't know what the numbers are or if we will have a say in them, but we are worried about it," said patrice timmons, a teacher at blackwell middle school in blackwell, oklahoma. the oklahoma education association, which represents more than 50,000 teachers in the state, has been pushing for a solution to the state's pension problem. "we are not anti-business," said nicole floyd, president of the state's largest teachers' union. "but we do have an alternative to what they are suggesting." in this small town, which has about 3,500 residents, there is one restaurant and one bar. neither are full at 4 p.m., when oklahoma house and senate committees will be meeting to discuss the budget. there is one gas station, which is also empty. "the fiscal cliff and this budget crisis are hitting everybody here," said tom kratzer, a general contractor and two-term mayor of his hometown. "but i think people are pretty fed up with it." kratzer said many people are talking about possible layoffs in town. "we've had layoffs before, but this time they may not be temporary," he said.
