Photographer Hugo Lloris shared this picture of a rose, saved as a JPEG in Photoshop, and shared online using the World Wide Web. The simple fact that he completes this creative process with his smartphone and the World Wide Web has sparked successful efforts to make working with digital artwork more accessible to the public. "I bought a computer in 1983, which was probably New Year's Eve. I bought a computer with a price tag on it that's exactly the same today," Lloris said. "A computer was a computer in 1983, but it's a completely different world now. You can buy a computer just so that you can do creative work without any restrictions, without spending half of your life on your computer." "The Internet is a message from the future... I can't tell you when, but it's going to come in the next ten years. It's going to be bigger than the book," Lloris said. "I like the idea of bringing to the future a thing from my past that has helped me and thousands of other people in the world to be creative." "In a way, any human being that creates something is bringing a message from the future to the past," Lloris said. "It doesn't go to the past, it goes to the future. If you think about it, the only future we have is one that we create with the past." 1 Related Question Answers Found This Version of Photoshop Is Best for Businesses?
