"Can your child take my laptop home? Since 2001 I have been studying and working in the application of techniques and insights from quantum mechanics in the practice of Jungian theory and therapy. I have come to believe that Jung's concept of 'psychoid' energy must be replaced by the "intelligent" network of quantum mechanics. Though Jung's concept of the "intelligent" psyche goes a long way in explaining the complexity of the psyche, we must also recognize that in humans the context of each conscious experience is both quantum and individuated. It is the interaction of the quantum and the personal that creates the unique context of each experience. I have been a student of Jungian theory since 1993 but found Jung's concept of the individuated psyche too naive and insufficient. I also found that those Jungian authors who acknowledged the role of quantum mechanics in the psyche were doing this largely at a post hoc level. This left me puzzled, since I was investigating the implications of quantum mechanics for client theory and therapy. What I have been able to see is that the relationship between the quantum and the personal in humans is analogous to that between the quantum and the personal in psyche. In both cases the quantum and personal must be jointly described and understood in order to properly describe an experience. I realized that Jung's talk of the individuated psyche must be replaced by a different set of concepts if we are to have a better description of the whole. A more useful concept for me is "the intelligent network of quantum mechanics". It's not just a set of axioms, but a model of how a quantum system might, in principle,
