From a reviewer's perspective, what's most important to me is the speed, consistency, and function. As the number of features Photoshop has continues to skyrocket, there is a myriad of options to begin with, and it just gets more confusing with every release. For the casual user, which is what Photoshop is mostly used for, it's impossible to anticipate the best workflow, and sometimes simply to make sense of what you have before you, let alone manufacturing a workflow that you can follow efficiently. When you dive into the world of creative editing, it's easy to startle at the amount of features that you can see. We like features.

Conceptually, according to Adobe's release information, Lightroom Lightroom 4 may offer features of Photoshop which has been available as a separate application for years now. It will be good to see if this is indeed the case. The Photoshop customer base is a much larger one than Lightroom users, so it would be good to see how this compares to the previous release versions.
