I would like to see Adobe start to integrate Photoshop into Photoshop Lightroom to remove the redundant work I have to do when I convert images from Photoshop to Adobe Preview and back to Photoshop. Lightroom is perfect for previewing images in the browser, and that way I have a preview of an image in images, even if I'm in other software. Aperture is excellent, but not perfect. In most cases I want to do the simple task of quickly opening and using an image. But Aperture can be so much more. Aperture has incredible workflow, including full image editing functionality. It's the fastest way to open an image, and it's the fastest way to save a photo completed from the workflow. It's also extremely flexible. I think the one thing Lightroom is missing is a way to quickly access a list of files. There's no fast way to search for all the files I have on a folder in Lightroom. Elements 15 changed that significantly, and it's nice to see Lightroom embrace that new capability. The search isn't particularly fast either. It is possible, of course, to use the Photoshop version on a Mac and simply export the document to a different format. Photoshop Express now supports the ability to view photos right away, which is something that I found very useful. Apple also includes a preview for downloading images, and a quick way to print multiple images. Photos can now be collected into Shared Collections for easier access, and exported into 3rd-party file formats.
