I was reading about Apple's MOS 6502 CPU, and I came across this line: Each stage needs 100 four-cycles, to work out the total time it needs. My question is: Why are there 100 four-cycles in a cycle? Why not 100 four-cycles for every instruction? A: An instruction takes a single cycle, but an instruction is processed by several cycles. For example, on a 6502, adding 4 to the accumulator requires two cycles. The first cycle adds 1 to the accumulator, the second adds 1. Subtracting 1 requires two cycles as well. If all instructions were processed in 100 four-cycle "cycles," the 6502 would be superslow. The 6502 is always running at the same speed. It can work on several different processes at once. If each instruction required only two cycles, it would be very slow, particularly on the 6502 which only had 256 bytes of RAM. If each instruction required 100 four-cycle cycles, then the 6502 would have to halt the entire processor to add one, and perhaps even longer for something like decre
