The discovery could lead to a better understanding of lung disease caused by cigarette smoking. "Our study findings could help in developing new treatments for chronic obstructive pulmonary disease [the fifth leading cause of death in the U.S.] and cystic fibrosis," said Roger J. Ritz, Ph.D., a postdoctoral research fellow in the Department of Microbiology and Immunology at the University of Minnesota. "Cystic fibrosis is a deadly disease that causes mucus to build up in the lung, blocking air flow. We showed that patients with cystic fibrosis have lower levels of the same enzyme, which would lead to decreased activity." Cigarette smoke is the chief risk factor for developing chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, which occurs when the lungs become filled with thick mucus that's less efficient at clearing out bacteria. Patients with cystic fibrosis have a higher than average risk for pneumonia, and doctors suspect the higher lung permeability, or defective mucus-clearance mechanism, is related to cystic fibrosis. Mucus normally clears bacteria in the respiratory
