"Share for Review (beta) is an excellent new way to collaborate on images," said Mike Laubhammer, General Manager of Creative Cloud, Adobe. "Our team of folks who have been testing this workflow extension are really excited about it. It makes it easier than ever to use Adobe Photoshop to create, share and open high-quality projects, regardless of the size of your working environment. And Adobe Sensei looks at the world around you and determines what you need, which is something I've seen in use countless times in my work. It makes sense and it works." There are three workflow scenarios in Share for Review. When a photographer sends an image or a photo-editing request to an online resource – such as a service like Shopify – to review and provide a proof of concept, the project can be saved and a new project can be opened within Share for Review with the original image intact. The project can be shared and made available as a web page or on Dropbox. In the most critical scenario, when the client needs to change the project in real time, it's still being saved and updated simultaneously. Other than the three scenarios, the image under review is still the original. Adobe has seen widespread adoption of Share for Review because it makes it faster and more affordable to share designs. For a company such as Shopify, the service is particularly compelling because it enables the website owner to split hairs on a project without having to open a new file. Photoshop will create a new document with the changes made, then the site owner will have the opportunity to review and approve the changes in real time.
